Examples of integrity concerns for the department

Example 1 (English Language Skills)
An applicant arranged for an impostor to sit the English language test on their behalf. The department identified this fraud through:
(a) a facial comparison of the photo on the test results with another photo of the applicant
(b) an interview with the applicant, indicating a low level of English proficiency
(c) verification of the International English Language Testing System (IELTS) score online. The department can detect & take action against English test fraud, but universities may also conduct checks of test results using online verification tools available from providers.

Example 2 (Genuine student / temporary entrant)
A departmental case officer had to consider a student visa application from an applicant from a country with high unemployment. He had strong family ties to Australia & had not studied for a significant period of time. The case officer requested an interview, and at the interview, the applicant was unable to explain why he had chosen his proposed course and provider and how the course would benefit him. Given his low employment prospects in his country of origin, strong ties to Australia and inability to provide basic information regarding his proposed course of study, the student’s application was refused.
Example 3 (Family background and financial support)
A departmental case officer received an application in which the student’s parents claimed to be in high-paying jobs in a reputable industry. The case officer requested an integrity check as these claims were uncommon in the region from which the applicant came. The officer was able to identify that the student’s parents did not have sufficient funds to contribute towards the student’s expenses. The application was refused as the case officer was not satisfied the applicant had sufficient funds to support himself in his studies onshore and, therefore, was not planning to come to Australia with the genuine intention to study.

Example 4 (Document fraud)
An overseas post identified an offshore website which claimed to be selling high quality forgeries of academic transcripts for use in migration applications. In these cases, officers are briefed on the basic characteristics of the forged documents and arrangements are put in place to verify qualifications with the issuing education providers.
